There are several ways to promote the adoption of new knowledge and influence policies at a large scale through networking. Here are a few ideas:

Collaborate with policy makers and other stakeholders: Building partnerships and collaborations with policy makers and other stakeholders can help you get your ideas and recommendations on the radar of decision makers and increase the chances of them being considered and implemented.

Use social media and other online platforms: Social media and other online platforms can be powerful tools for spreading information and getting your message out to a large audience. Use these platforms to share research, data, and insights on the importance of adopting new knowledge, and engage with others in discussions and debates on the topic.

Participate in industry events and conferences:

Attending and presenting at industry events and conferences can give you a platform to share your ideas and insights with a large and diverse audience.

Engage with the media: Working with the media to publicize your ideas and research can help to raise awareness and influence policy decisions.

Network with other organizations and individuals: Building a strong network of like-minded organizations and individuals can help you amplify your voice and increase your impact.
